Department of Education, Office of the Secretary

The National Council on Education and the Arts (NCEA) is a federal agency that provides leadership and support for the nation's education and arts programs. It was established in 1954 by the National Education Act, which was signed into law by President Dwight D. Eisenhower. The NCEA's primary mission is to coordinate and support the efforts of the Department of Education and the National Endowment for the Arts (NEA) in promoting the quality of education and the arts in the United States. The Council is composed of members from both the executive and legislative branches of the federal government, as well as representatives from the states and the private sector. The NCEA's work is carried out through a variety of programs and initiatives, including the National Center for Education Policy (NCEP), the National Center for the Arts (NCA), and the National Center for Educational Policy Studies (NCEPS). The Council also provides technical assistance and funding to state and local education agencies, as well as to the arts community. The NCEA's efforts are aimed at ensuring that all students have access to a high-quality education and that the arts are an integral part of that education. The Council's work is essential to the nation's future, as it helps to ensure that our children are prepared to meet the challenges of the 21st century.
